Not illustrated. 1907 edition. Excerpt: ...every function in perfect operation, the best results can not be obtained, either with the vital or the mechanical machine. Without heat, water would fail to develop steam, and without combustion there could be no heat. Without water, combustion and heat would be useless; and in the absence of a Boiler there could be no retention of force, and the energy of these elements could not be successfully applied through this particular machine. With no steam-chest, energy could not be concentrated, and in the absence of special machinery the concentrated energy could not be applied for a definite purpose. Steam is the active agency of this design, and without it no possible action can be established in that machine. To return for a moment to the list of elements. combined and activities involved in the steam engine: The objective list is composed entirely of physical elements. Each one is material in construction, and in its present state can never leave the earth; yet, in character, each is distinctly spiritual, deriving its characteristics directly from the corresponding subjective principle, without which the physical would not exist. The Subjective list is entirely spiritual, and belongs ANALOGY OF IDEAS. 147 to the realm of active, conscious Reality. Each item of the list is an idea in universal mind, and has its being independent of materiality. It cannot be manifested in sensation, except through some material construction embodying its principles. But the objective representation is not the same real entity that the subjective principle is. The subjective can continue to be, independent of the existence of the objective, while the objective can have no existence apart from the subjective, which is its foundation. Steam illustrates...
